BETWEEN:

Syed Mohammad Arif

Applicant

and

The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration

Respondent

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT AND JUDGMENT

[1] To be granted citizenship in a country such as Canada one should consider oneself privileged. Citizenship should only be granted to individuals who are prepared not only to accept the benefits of Canadian citizenship but to fulfill the obligations of Canadian citizens.

[2] This is an appeal pursuant to subsection 14(5) of the Citizenship Act (R.S., 1985, c. C-29) (“the Act”) and section 21 of the Federal Courts Act (R.S., 1985, c. F-7), of a decision rendered on May 26, 2008, wherein the Citizenship Judge (“the judge”) rejected Mr. Syed Mohammad Arif’s (“the applicant”) application for Canadian citizenship.

Background

[3] The applicant was born on June 21, 1964 in Karachi, Pakistan and is 43 years of age. On March 31, 2001 he became a permanent resident of Canada and arrived in Canada on the same day.

[4] On June 12, 2005, he applied for Canadian citizenship, and the applicant was given a hearing with the judge on April 8th, 2008.

[5] On May 26, 2008, the judge denied the applicant Canadian citizenship and provided notice to the Minister of this decision.

[6] On July 4, 2008, a letter was sent to the applicant confirming the denial of citizenship following a review of the additional documentation requested at the hearing.

Impugned Decision

[7] The judge found that the applicant did not meet the requirements of subsection 5(1)(c) of the Act, according to which an applicant is required to have accumulated at least three years of residence in Canada within the four years immediately preceding his or her application.

[8] The four year period in question is that of June 12, 2001 to June 12, 2005 (the “review period”).

[9] After noting that the applicant had been absent 326 days during the review period, the judge indicated that the primary issue is whether or not the applicant meets the residence requirement under subsection 5(1)(c) of the Act. In coming to the conclusion that the applicant does not meet this residence requirement, the judge made the following observations:

1. There is a discrepancy between the applicant's residence questionnaire and the solemn declaration provided by his sister. While the applicant states that he has lived at his sister's address since July 2002, his sister had written that he has lived there since March 31, 2001.
2. The applicant has not been able to find work in his field and has filed income tax returns for 2003 and 2004 showing an income of $0 for both years.
3. The applicant has not terminated his business outside of Canada because it is a family business managed by his brother, and the applicant has reported trips outside of Canada for business and family related purposes.
4. Bank statements and Rogers Wireless bills are not in and of themselves sufficient to prove residency.
5. The applicant is separated from his wife who lives with their children in the U.K. His mother and sister live in Canada.

[10] It is important to note that the applicant filed income tax returns for the 2003 and 2004 years showing an income of $0 for both years (see pages 27 & 30 of the Tribunal Record).

[11] In the judge's letter to the applicant notifying him of the negative decision the judge explains that after considering all of the documents, including those additional documents requested at the hearing, the applicant does not meet the requirement as defined in subsection 5(1)(c) of the Act.

Issues

[12] The issues for determination by this court are the following:

- 1) Did the judge err in finding that the evidence submitted by the Applicant did not demonstrate that he meets the residency requirements provided at subsection 5(1)(c) of the Act?
- 2) Was the applicant credible by showing $0 as income on his income tax returns in Canada for the 2003 and 2004 taxation years?

Statutory Framework

[13] The relevant statutory provisions are the following:

Analysis

Standard of Review

[14] In Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick, 2008 SCC 9, the Supreme Court established that where jurisprudence has already determined in a satisfactory manner the degree of deference to be accorded to a particular category of questions, there is no need to engage in a standard of review analysis (paragraph 57).

[15] Recently in Zhang v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) 2008 FC 483, Justice Blanchard explained, at paragraphs 7-8, that:

The question of whether an appellant meets the residency requirement involves an issue of mixed fact and law on which Citizenship Judges are owed a degree of deference by reason of their special knowledge and expertise in these matters. The ample jurisprudence of this Court has established the applicable standard of review for such a question to be reasonableness simpliciter. (Chen v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) [2006] F.C.J. No. 119, 2006 FC 85 at paras. 6; Rizvi v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) [2005] F.C.J. No. 2029, 2005 FC 1641 at para. 5; Xu v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) [2005] F.C.J. No. 88, 2005 FC 700 at para. 13 and Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Fu, [2004] F.C.J. No. 88, 2004 FC 60 at para. 7). The Supreme Court of Canada in David Dunsmuir v. Her Majesty the Queen in Right of the Province of New Brunswick, [2008] S.C.J. No. 9, 2008 SCC 9, recently decided that there are now only two standards of review; reasonableness and correctness. I am satisfied upon consideration of the principles and factors discussed in Dunsmuir that the applicable standard of review for the question before me is reasonableness.

[16] That being said, while a Citizenship Judge is free to choose which residency test to adopt for the purposes of deciding an application, a blending of different tests is an error of law, and is proper ground for appeal. Sio v. Canada, [1999] F.C.J. No. 422 (Q.L.), at para. 10; Hsu v. Canada (M.C.I.), 2001 FCT 579. A misunderstanding of the jurisprudence surrounding residency will lead to a decision being reviewed on a correctness standard. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Xiong, 2004 FC 1129.

Issue 1: Did the judge err in finding that the evidence submitted by the Applicant did not demonstrate that he meets the residency requirements provided at subsection 5(1)(c) of the Act?

[17] The thrust of the applicant's argument is that the judge erred in blending different residency tests. The applicant alleges that by citing a strict count of days of physical presence and then going on to refer at significant length and in a critical manner to the Applicant's documentary evidence, the judge engaged in a blending of tests. According to the applicant, this error is heightened by the fact that the applicant has been physically present in Canada for at least three out of the four years immediately preceding his application for citizenship.

[18] The respondent argues that the reasons of the judge reveal that the applicant failed to meet the first stage of the two-pronged inquiry with respect to his residency requirements: i.e. the threshold determination as to whether residency has been indeed established. The respondent contends that, having failed the applicant on the first stage, the judge correctly denied citizenship to the applicant. The judge never addressed the second step of the analysis and could not, therefore, have erred in blending the various residency tests.

[19] It is generally accepted that the proper approach to an analysis under subsection 5(1)(c) of the Act is as explained in Goudimenko v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) [2002] FCT 447, at paragraph 13:

...[A] two-stage inquiry exists with respect to the residency requirements of paragraph 5(1)(c) of the Act. At the first stage, the threshold determination is made as to whether or not, and when, residence in Canada has been established. If residence has not been established, the matter ends there. If the threshold has been met, the second stage of the inquiry requires a determination of whether or not the particular applicant's residency satisfies the required total days of residence. It is with respect to the second stage of the inquiry, and particularly with regard to whether absences can be deemed residence, that the divergence of opinion in the Federal Court exists. (my emphasis)

[20] This divergence of opinion, referenced above with respect to the second stage of the inquiry, refers to the different approaches to the definition of “residency” under the Citizenship Act. This is briefly explained in Seiffert v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2005 FC 1072, at para 6:

In a given case, a citizenship judge is free to select between three tests decided by this Court, being the stringent test found by Justice Muldoon in Re Pourghasemi, [1993] F.C.J. No. 232 (T.D.), the flexible test found by Justice Thurlow in Re Papadogiorgakis, [1978] 2 F.C. 208 (T.D.), and the test stated by Justice Reed in Re Koo, [1992] F.C.J. No. 1107 (T.D.) which is an adjunct to the decision in Re Papadogiorgakis.

[21] These various tests are explained in Ping v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2007 FC 777, at paragraph 4:

...One of these tests, referred to as the physical presence test or the Pourghasemi test, [1993] F.C.J. No. 232, requires an applicant be physically present in Canada for at least 1095 days. The other two tests take more flexible approaches to the residency requirement. For example the Koo test, [1992] F.C.J. No. 1107, requires an assessment of an applicant's absences from Canada with the aim of determining what kind of connection an applicant has with Canada and whether the applicant "regularly, normally or customarily lives" in Canada. A citizenship judge may apply any of the three tests and the Court can review the decision to ensure that the test chosen by the citizenship judge has been properly applied.

[22] Therefore, according to the above, an analysis under subsection 5(1)(c) of the Act involves a two-stage analysis. In the first step it must be determined whether and when the applicant has established himself or herself in Canada. The second step involves a counting of days according to any of the three accepted methods. One of the ways to show “establishment” is to fulfill the obligations of citizens by reporting one’s world wide income.

[23] This two-stage approach was developed in the context of applicants who had not been physically present in Canada for at least 1095 days during the four years immediately preceding their application for citizenship. As explained by Justice O’Keefe in Sharma v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2003 FC 1384, where an applicant seeks to have absences counted as days resident in Canada, the applicant must first establish residence in Canada. Justice O’Keefe explains this proposition at paragraph 34:

A review of the authorities indicates that the period of absences from Canada have only been counted towards the required 1,095 days if the applicant has centralized his or her mode of living in Canada before the absences begin (see, for example, Goudimenko v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2002 FCT 447; Ahmed v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2002 FCT 1067; Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Brockie, [2000] F.C.J. No. 1967 (T.D.); Mandal v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2002 FCT 488).

[24] This establishment of residence threshold provides the basis for which absences may be counted towards the 1095 day requirement under subsection 5(1)(c) of the Act. Indeed the development in the jurisprudence, beginning with In re Citizenship Act and in re Antonios E. Papadogiorgakis, [1978] 2 F.C. 208, which interprets the residency requirement more generously, was intended to allow applicants who found themselves outside of Canada to satisfy the “residency” requirement under the Act by deeming periods outside of Canada as days resident in Canada. (see Qiao v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2002 FCT 228, at para 18).

[25] These tests developed so as to provide the opportunity for applicants to overcome a strict counting of days and satisfy subsection 5(1)(c) on a more generous interpretation of that provision.

[26] In the present case, it is undisputed that the applicant has been physically present in Canada for at least 1095 days during the review period.

[27] It is also undisputed that the applicant has failed to establish himself in Canada as a result of his failure to report any income for his 2003 and 2004 taxation years.

[28] I repeat what I have stated above, an applicant for citizenship in Canada must have adequate knowledge of Canada and of the responsibilities and privileges of citizenship.

[29] According to the Citizenship Judge's notes found on page 14 of the Tribunal Record, the Judge states "The applicant declares on the Residence Questionnaire that he did not terminate his business outside Canada because it is a family business managed by his brother".

[30] In the Residence Questionnaire, the applicant states as to his absences, that he was out of Canada December 25, 2005 to January 24, 2006 and was in Pakistan "on business & family"; December 6, 2005 to December 17, 2005 in London, U.K. for "business & family"; June 19, 2005 to December 6, 2005 in Pakistan for "business & family"; April 14, 2005 to March 27, 2005 in London, U.K. for "business & family"; June 7, 2005 to January 13, 2005 in the U.K. for "business & family"; December 5, 2004 to January 7, 2005 in Pakistan for "business & family"; May 27, 2003 to September 25, 2003 in Pakistan for "business & family"; February 26, 2003 to April 18, 2003 in Pakistan for "business & family" (see page 46 of the Tribunal Record).

[31] If, from February 2003 to January 2006, the applicant was out of Canada for business and for visiting family in Pakistan and/or the United Kingdom, and this on different occasions, how is it that he did not earn any revenue to report to the income tax authorities?

[32] This clearly indicates a failure of the applicant to fulfill his responsibilities and thus his failure to establish his residency in Canada, at least for the years 2003 and 2004.

[33] I am satisfied that the Citizenship Judge was correct in her conclusion that the applicant failed to fulfill his residency requirement pursuant to the Citizenship Act.

JUDGMENT

For the above reasons, THIS COURT ADJUGES that the appeal is dismissed.
